Dhaka: Saudi Arabia's budget airline Flynas has announced it will start direct flights between Dammam and Damascus next month.

The move marks the carrier's expansion into Syria, aligning with its broader growth strategy and supporting the kingdom's ambitions to boost aviation and tourism sectors.

Starting October 3, flynas will operate three weekly flights linking King Fahd International Airport in Dammam with Damascus International Airport.

The move makes Dammam the third Saudi city with direct flights to the Syrian capital, following Riyadh and Jeddah.

In June, flynas became the first Saudi carrier to resume services to Damascus after a long suspension, and the addition of Dammam will bring its total to 17 weekly flights to Syria.

Tickets are available across the airline's booking platforms, including its website, mobile app, call center, and through travel agents.
